AND MY SISTER RACHEL.

EDITOR'S NOTE

THE fact that my father has never preserved any list of his drawings renders the task of Iconography extremely difficult. Great pains have been taken to render this Catalogue as complete as possible; but, owing to the practical impossibility of tracing all his work, it must not be assumed that any portrait, which claims to be by my father and is yet not mentioned in these pages, is necessarily of doubtful authenticity. I have also purposely omitted numerous portraits of members of the artist's family, and a still larger number of slight studies.

I desire to express my sincere gratitude to all owners of the portraits who have lent me originals for reproduction, or supplied me with descriptive details.

INTRODUCTION

NOT long ago I was looking through a few of some hundreds of letters that I have kept; and among those which I paused over, and mused and smiled over, was a note sent to me at Oxford, in the Summer Term of 1893, by a Christ Church man. The writer wanted me to dine with him on the following Tuesday, 'to meet a young painter' who had just arrived from Paris. The prospective host had not yet seen him, but 'his name is Rothenstein.' And there was a postscript: 'I understand that he speaks English perfectly.'

But for that assurance, I might not have accepted the invitation. Nor, but for my belief that the small, dark, unhesitating man whom in due course I met was a stranger to our shores, might I have been so astounded as I was by his ease and mastery. There were four or five other guests, and all, I fancy, had come prepared to help a lame dog over a stile. Instead of which they found themselves trying to keep pace with the thoughts of a thinker and the mots of a wit who couldn't have seemed more at home on his own shores—whatever those shores might be. Withal, young, obviously, in years—as young as any of us. How very callow the elder members of the party seemed beside him!—mere children, new-born babes even. One of the younger ones wrote in recent times a fantastic story in which the effect of Will Rothenstein upon the undergraduates (and dons) of Oxford was incidentally described. I can testify that the writer did not exaggerate what was felt. It was awe. Joy was mingled with it, of course, but—an awful joy, which somehow didn't become less awful when we found that our visitor was a native of Great Britain.

For one who lives usually, as I do, rather far from the land of his birth, the force of old first impressions is even greater than it is for most men; and my instinct is ever to think of my old friend Will not as a Professor out there in South Kensington, with multitudes of rapt pupils day by day, and with already a vast quantity of paintings and drawings done and now hoarded in private collections or flaunted in public galleries, but as a very young man with just the world before him, and Oxford for a few weeks agone in the meantime. This habit could have no more violent corrective than the sheaves that lie before me—proof-sheets of a monumental iconography composed in filial piety by a grown-up son.

The reason why these lie before me is no shock to me. Never parted from myself, I am well aware that I am quite old enough to be invited to write a few words for such a volume. My bother is that the years in their passage have not at all qualified me to perform the task worthily. Perhaps indeed the years' failure is the reason why I was chosen. The choice of introducer cannot have been an easy one. I imagine the son saying, 'Father, does the Archbishop of Canterbury know much about graphic art?' and the father replying, 'My child, there must ever be value in any opinions held on any subject by a man of wide spiritual experience. But already the massiveness of the temple that you have reared in my honour oppresses me rather. Get that frivolous young thing, Max Beerbohm, to come and throw some somersaults on the steps of this great edifice.' I imagine the son pointing out that I am no longer frivolous or young or agile, and the father realising the truth of this, but saying, 'No matter. At any rate he's undignified.' So here I am. But fuller of awe than ever.

'Awe' is just what Will, in a prefatory note to the catalogue of a recent exhibition of early drawings by him, has said that he felt for some of those famous elders who sat to him in the days that I recall. I was not present at those sittings, and had supposed rather, from his comments on those gods, that some such phrase as 'acute intellectual curiosity' would have met the case. About Whistler, of whom in Paris he had been seeing much, he was wont to speak with more or less bated breath. But acquaintance with that sharp and blithe, that 'wicked' and wonderful but not altogether imitable old spirit was unlikely to foster in any lad a generalised sense of reverence for the reverend. I am inclined to think that the awe of which Will is now conscious was only subconscious at the time when those drawings were done. It was there, right enough, but not very obtrusive—even in the drawings. It was there because Will, despite his natural high spirits, and despite the temporary influence of Whistler upon the outlook of all striplings who passed by, was a man of essentially sober intellect. One sometimes realised this, even then. I remember an evening at the Café Royal (can we greybeards never set pen to paper without remembering some evening at the Café Royal?) when Oscar Wilde, who had for some time been talking in a vein of iridescent nonsense about some important matter, paused and said, with good reason and with genuine feeling, 'My dear Will, don't look so serious!' It was not often that the sobriety of my friend's intellect exposed itself in those days. But the intellect itself was forever to the fore, and not less in his work than in his talk.

His work during the past thirty years and more has been very various, both in medium and in subject-matter. But it has always had the common denominator of his intellectual force, and this force is also, I think, the outstanding and governing factor in it. Even if he be painting a barn or a tree, a cart or a hedgerow, he seems to be saying, 'What is this object? Just what part does it play among the eternal verities? And just how can I best pluck the heart out of it?' I cannot pretend to answer such questions. I edge away to ground on which I feel safer—though far from secure. Caricaturists (and I am of that lowly tribe) are in some sort students of human character through the human form. They are rather more able than most people to appreciate what the serious portraitist is out for and up to. And it is to portraiture more than to any other single kind of work that Will Rothenstein has devoted his unceasing energy.

In portraiture, as in other forms of drawing and painting, a good deal can be achieved with very slight expenditure of brain-power. The brain may be hardly more than the transmitter of messages from the eager eyes to the well-trained hand (via the pure warm heart); and if it transmit these accurately, the result will be delightful, and in some cases—such as that of the latest débutante or a very young Master of Hounds—satisfactory. Nevertheless, an artist who is nothing but sensitive and skilful must, I am sure, feel much happier sitting on a camp-stool and doing a landscape than when he is confronted with even the most meaningless of human sitters. Brains are an advantage to the landscape painter; but a fine landscape can be done without their assistance; whereas in the doing of a fine portrait they are as needful as sensibility and skill—aye! even in portrayal of a quite null person, inasmuch as without a profound statement of that nullity the portrait, though it be satisfactory for a while, will soon pall.

With the faces of quite null persons Will has dealt more frequently than I had supposed before seeing this iconography. (None of these is reproduced here, nor will I give the numbers of the pages on which their owners' names occur: I will merely say that, to the best of my recollection, profundity of statement was not stinted.) But the striking thing is the enormous number of truly distinguished persons here enshrined. That impulse which first whirled Will up to Oxford, the impulse to do a 'set' of the people who mattered most in a place that matters much, has never since loosened its hold on him. Celebrities come and go. Celebrities leave Will cold—unless they be something more than celebrated. Distinction is what he likes; and if it be coupled with obscurity, no matter: there it is, and all the better perhaps. There is something almost snobbish in Will's austere freedom from snobbery. Private nullity he will patiently record. To the public kind he is adamant. One is guilty of the weakness of shedding a tear for those famous men whose names are not here enshrined. They have been judged and found wanting. True, the sentence passed upon them is merely negative. It is not, however, the less heavy. One wishes the judge could be induced to reconsider his ——— but no! Let not our sentimentalism try to tamper with his righteousness and rightness. Let posterity have all untainted (but for the queer inclusion of myself) this august record of what has been best among us in our time.

What would we not give to possess a similar record of . . . oh, the pitfalls that abound for unwary writers! I was about to say 'the men of Johnson's time', quite forgetting Sir Joshua. Will some scribbler in the next century be on the point of forgetting Will? Sir Joshua's gift, like my friend's, was primarily intellectual, but (and hence, perhaps, the narrow shave I had a moment ago) Sir Joshua was of worldlier fibre, and a merely pretty lady or merely fine gentleman was safe, in his hands, from 'profundity of statement'. Indeed, these were the sitters he most tended to, good easy man. But outside that enchanting galaxy were certain other persons, his particular friends, his peers, on depiction of whom he honestly, and with passion, lavished the fulness of his power. Such men as Johnson or Burke or Goldsmith sounded the depth of him, and he of them. It is a pity that no painter had Reynolds' mental calibre in the days of Byron and Shelley. A little later came the drawings of Maclise. Let us be grateful for those lucid and gay presentments of the men that flourished around Fraser's Magazine. But Maclise was only a light-weight. The back-view of Bulwer making his toilet before a cheval-glass is all we need; but the front-view of old S. T. Coleridge leaning on his stick tells us little, where so much was to be told. Many of the later Victorians had the advantage of G. F. Watts's fine and disinterested attention; but this advantage was not great. Watts himself, though in a way very different from Maclise's, was a light-weight: he was ethereal, and saw Browning and all those other massive persons of his day as spirits already in Heaven, at peace there, behind a golden haze which to-day gives one a sense of difficulty in finding one's way around the room devoted to them by the Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery. While Mr. Sargent, that great master, was living, I often wondered that he did not make, as he so well might have made, a point of selecting only such sitters as were worthy of him. He was definitely 'an intellectual', and no man was a greater respecter or better discriminator of intellect. Also, he was intensely fastidious, in literature, in music, in all things. How many a canvas or sheet of paper testifies to his dislike of the vapidness or vulgarity of the lady or gentleman at his mercy! He certainly relieved his feelings. But why should he have let his feelings suffer so often? With what joy he could rise to a great occasion is shown by his portrait of Coventry Patmore. I never saw that sitter; but no matter: there he is, the author of all his works, the entire man, body and soul. That picture was done many years ago, before Mr. Sargent began to dislike portrait-painting. In later years, when a great occasion came his way he did not always rise to it. No man was a greater devotee or more acute appreciator of the writings of Henry James. And certainly no portrait could be superficially more like Henry James than was the portrait that his friend painted for his seventieth birthday. But it will rather puzzle the students of that writer's work in future ages, whereas the sight, for a few minutes, of the man himself would have satisfied them as completely as the portrait of Patmore satisfies me.

I tell them that at the time when Will Rothenstein did the lithograph that is reproduced in this volume Henry James's head was less magnificently characteristic than it became in his old age. But they will not listen to me: 'This', I hear them saying, 'is assuredly the man we know, poor troubled soul, hesitating in all sorts of agony before he takes the deep dark plunge into his "later manner".' And assuredly it is. The greater the chance, it seems to me as I look through these drawings, the firmer is Will Rothenstein's grasp of it. And the older he grows, it also seems to me, the firmer the grasp becomes. The drawing of Lord Balfour is one of many that lead me to suppose that a drawing of Henry James in later years would have probed even further and more finely than this early one. The artist's vision of his sitters has in its strength a greater delicacy than of yore. There is more of sympathy now in the sure understanding. That quality of 'awe' which in the old days was, as I have said, not apparent, does now appear—and appears not less clearly in the portraits of quite young men than in those of men whose very years would suffice to make them venerable. I remember that Aubrey Beardsley delighted greatly in the pastel that you will see here. The wit of it was very congenial to his taste. But he might have liked it less could he have foreseen how Will would be drawing the marvellous boys of a later era. The change is extremely interesting. And the technical method of draughtsmanship has of course changed also, in accordance to the deepening and mellowing of spirit. It is a beautifully right method for one whose way now is to seek out truth by seeking out what is best.

I trust that Will's faculty for awe will never develop so far as to prevent his fingers from putting pencil to paper. I reassure myself that if anything of the sort seemed likely to occur the fierce spirit of youth would rise again in him and adjust matters. And I like to think that thirty years hence there will be sitting in his studio a small man with a patriarchal white beard, saying in 'perfect English' as many stimulating things as ever while he records with just the requisite amount of awe the faces and characters of distinguished youths unborn at the moment when I write these words.
